A former Senior Partner and Global Managing Director at the legendary design firm IDEO shows how to design conversations and meetings that are creative and impactful. Conversations are one of the most fundamental means of communicating as we have them. At their best, conversations are unstructured, authentic—open and two or more people sharing thoughts and ideas in a way that bridges our individual experiences, achievements, and limitations. When they function well, you feel empowered and energized. But when they don’t? You often walk away from a meeting feeling really bad? That moved the item in the forward in some important way? You’re not alone. In his practice as a designer, Fred Dust began to approach conversations differently. After years of trying to break communication between colleagues and clients, he came to believe that there was a degree to the art of conversation itself with intention and purpose, but still artful and playful. Making Conversation offers what he learned and outlines the four elements essential to successful exchanges: Commitment, Creative Listening, Clarity, and Context. Taken together, these four elements form a set of resources anyone can use to be more deliberate and purposeful in making conversations work.

However, model theoretic descriptions of the systems level cognitive processes responsible for integrating auditory and visual speech information have not been formulated. This paper presents new data and review of previous studies on auditory and visual speech perception in order to construct such a theoretical framework.

Unfortunately, the use and development of such games tend to rely on very traditional pedagogical principles; that learning games should be used to make a test academic content available and present it in a realistic manner. To revitalize learning games as innovative tools, a study of the EIS Simulations is presented to critically readdress the learning process of such games, concluding that to be truly innovative, learning games should try to break with those traditions.

Leadershift is about adapting and changing traditional models of leadership in response to the influence of mass collaboration. Mass collaboration is a form of collective action which occurs when large numbers of people work independently on a single project, exemplified by websites such as YouTube, Facebook and Second Life. As the traditional models of working are radically altered those in leadership roles need to understand their place in this new hierarchy and how to respond. Mass collaboration requires a form of leadership that is prepared to let go of the experience, expertise and control it holds precious and be able to see mass participation as an opportunity to create value rather than a threat to its existence.
